AADHAAR IS WIN-WIN FOR ALL

The Aadhaar-based identity authentication platform is a win-win for both the government and the people. The government obtains huge fiscal gains and the people higher degree of empowerment, argues Nandan Nilekani in this article.

The government is implementing the Direct Benefit Transfer (DBT) programme for 26 schemes in 43 districts in the country now and is planning to expand the size and scope of it. The whole strategy and architecture of direct benefit and cash transfers were to create a platform through which the government could transfer money for social welfare schemes or subsidies directly and unambiguously to the intended beneficiary. We have millions of beneficiaries and therefore, the big question is, how to build highly scalable technology-based infrastructure to make sure that the benefit reaches the right person?

There are multiple components to this question. One is we have the Aadhaar number, which is essentially a unique ID. It is a number assigned to a person so that the individual can be correctly identified in an online environment. We have issued Aadhaar numbers to 340 million people so far. To operationalise the DBT, bank accounts are needed in order to integrate the Aadhaar system with the banking system. A mapper system maintains the relationship between the Aadhaar number and the bank where a DBT beneficiary has the account. This mapper is maintained by the National Payment Corporation of India (NPCI), a company set up by banks and the Reserve Bank of India (RBI) to be the agent for all retail payments like ATM networks and pass networks. A person's bank account and the Aadhaar number are linked through a process called seeding.

The whole platform can be used for different kinds of things, but broadly, there are three. One is direct cash transfers into bank accounts for schemes like scholarships, pensions, Mahatma Gandhi National Rural Employment Guarantee Scheme (MGNREGS) wages and so on.

The second is direct benefit transfer to pay subsidy money for goods like LPG cylinders, food and fertiliser. Third, it can also be used for conditional cash transfers where the government pays certain amounts of money based on the school attendance of the child and so on. Fool-Proof Identification for Direct Benefit Transfer Targeting the beneficiary accurately is what Aadhaar does. For instance, we have social welfare schemes like old age pension, disability pension and widow pension. Different departments at the state level or district level maintain these lists of beneficiaries. But the lists are infested with duplicates and ghosts and to eliminate them, the Aadhaar number is the key. Let's say there is a list of 10,000 pension beneficiaries, but when the Aadhaar number is verified, the number of genuine persons in the list might come down to much less, say, 7,000. The savings for the government is huge when fraud and wastage are tracked and tackled. Basically, we have a platform, which allows the government to transfer money to millions of people because the whole system is highly scalable, traceable and accountable. When the DBT is expanded, every day you may have millions of transactions and they all go electronically from different departments directly into bank accounts. Currently the money has started going into people's accounts using this technology wherever the DBT programme is being implemented.

Then comes the question, how do people take money out of their accounts? Obviously they can go to the bank branch or an ATM. However, to make transactions ubiquitous, we need some kind of a low-cost banking model which allows people to do business from anywhere in the country.

The RBI and Ministry of Finance has been actively promoting Business Correspondents (BCs) who are essentially agents of a bank from where people can conduct banking business without pain. They can be employees of a bank, self-help groups, Anganwadi or ASHA (Accredited Social Health Activist) workers, grocery stores or petrol pumps as long as three conditions are complied with - they need to be attached to a bank, which appoints them and they need to have an online device connectable to the banking network. Historically BCs have been dedicated to one bank or one village. But what we have now done using the Aadhaar authentication is create the ability to have an interoperable network of BCs who do online verification of identity anywhere in the country. Beneficiaries can withdraw money (or deposit it) even if the account is in a different bank from that of the BC with whom they are transacting. It is very similar to an ATM network. This online interoperable network is getting rolled out both with banks and post-offices. BCs carry a hand-held biometric device called the micro-ATM. When the DBT puts money into a person's bank account, the whole transaction - from authentication to money transfer through the interbank switch of NPCI - takes less than a minute.

Accountability, Traceability and Transparency

Fundamentally, the Aadhaar-based platform solves five problems. First, it cleans beneficiary databases of duplicate or non-existent names, thereby reducing the chances of wastage. Secondly, the Aadhaar number eliminates fraud and makes sure that the money goes straight into the bank account of the beneficiary. Thirdly, the Aadhaar card being a KYC (Know Your Customer) allows a person to open a bank account. Fourthly, the Aadhaar authentication at the micro-ATM allows people to withdraw money from anywhere in the country. And finally, the entire transaction is traceable from end-to-end. So you have a high level of accountability, traceability and transparency built into the system.

This is what happens in the case of cash transfer, for example, on pensions and scholarships. What happens in the case of goods? Let's take LPG for example. The government has a dual pricing system where a customer is entitled to nine subsidised cylinders in a year and at market price for additional ones. The market price of the cylinder is approximately ₹ 900 and the subsidised price is ₹ 400. However, the problem is that someone can get a cylinder at ₹ 400 and then sell it to somebody at ₹ 900. To make the system fraud-proof, the government has to ensure that all the cylinders are sold at ₹ 900 and then the subsidy is paid as DBT for the first nine cylinders. The beneficiary will get ₹ 500 into the bank account using the electronic cash transfer within 48 hours of buying the cylinder. This allows the market price to prevail and stops diversion. It also allows the companies which are selling LPG to operate in a market mode because the subsidies are paid electronically. The same principle could be applied to food, fertiliser and other goods. It is unique as it generates an auditable and transparent electronic trail. It is important strategic intervention as it helps the government to streamline benefit delivery.

THE COST OF PARLIAMENTARY DISRUPTION

- Chakshu Roy

The budget session of Parliament is the longest session in the Parliamentary calendar. The session is split into two halves. The first half of the session starts with a joint sitting of both houses which is addressed by the President. In his address to both houses, he recaps the initiatives and the progress made by the government in the last year, presents a roadmap of the governments policy and legislative proposals and also focus areas for the current year. Thereafter the railway and the finance minister present their budgets. There is then a discussion in Parliament on the presidents address and the budgets. Both the houses then break for three weeks, in which the departmentally related standing committees scrutinize the budgets of the various ministries. Parliament reconvenes after the break to discuss the working of certain ministries and also to pass laws. Being the longest session of the year, a major part of the legislative function that Parliament discharges in a year, happens in this session.

This year, the first part of the budget session progressed as planned. However, the session was adjourned sine die two days ahead of schedule. As a result of disruptions during the second half, no financial or legislative work could be conducted. Before the beginning of the budget session of Parliament, other than routine financial business government had planned to introduce 19 Bills and get Parliamentary approval on 38 Bills. At the end of the Budget Session, 16 Bills had been introduced and 2 Bills were passed. Parliament was also supposed to debate the working of 4 ministries but none of them could be discussed.

The Chairman of Rajya Sabha, in his closing remarks on the last day of the session observed, "The experience of this Session, particularly of its second half, should induce cogitation on a number of matters arising out of the situation in which the House finds itself in its daily functioning. Three questions in particular need to be addressed. One, has the balance between deliberation, legislation and accountability been lost due to regular disruptions of the proceedings? Two, has the time not come to bridge the growing gap between the rules of procedure and the need felt by different sections of done in an orderly manner to preserve the dignity of the House. Three, has the membership of this august body assessed the impact of disruptive behaviour on public opinion?"

The observations made by the presiding officer of Rajya Sabha are extremely insightful, specially when one looks at how the functioning of Parliament has been dogged by disruptions over the last three years. In some Parliamentary sessions MPs from different political parties have been able to find a way of evolving a consensus and in others this has not been the case. Lets look at the observations made by the Chairman of Rajya Sabha in a little more detail.

In 2010, Lok Sabha worked for 57% of its scheduled time. This was a result of the entire winter session being disrupted on the demand for formation of a Joint Parliamentary Committee (JPC) inquire into the 2G spectrum allocation issue. In 2011 Budget Session, a JPC was constituted and the deadlock was resolved. While the year witnessed its fair share of disruptions on issues related to the anti corruption movement, Telangana, etc. the Lok Sabha was able to work for 70% of Geoinformatics is an information and communication technology that is a blend of elements from geo-science and informatics. It is an emerging field of vocation that promises challenging and lucrative opportunities across industries and has application in almost all walks of life.

According to Mr. P.L.N. Raju, author of 'Fundamentals of Geographic Information Systems,' Geoinformatics is "the science and technology dealing with the structure and character of spatial information, its capture, its classification and qualification, its storage, processing, portrayal and dissemination, including the infrastructure necessary to secure optimal use of this information."

In simple terms, Geoinformatics constitutes tools and technology required to collect, analyse and envisage the Earth and its resources from space. The spatial data can be anything related to the geographic location of Earth's boundaries, oceans, natural features, man-made structures, and so on. This information helps in confronting the challenges encountered by Geography, Geosciences and allied engineering fields.

Geoinformatics constitutes remote sensing of images, mapping, modelling, data analysis, computer programming, developing Geospatial databases and designing information systems. The Geoinformation is analysed using techniques called Geocomputation and Geovisualisation. The results of computation and analysis are saved in user-friendly formats and are updated regularly.

This interdisciplinary science finds application in numerous fields. Civil engineering, environmental engineering, mineral exploration, agriculture, forestry, public health, natural resource management, defence and even commercial business are some of them. In-car navigation systems, automatic vehicle location systems, aviation, maritime transport and traffic network planning are based on this technology. Google Maps, satellite navigation systems and GPS enabled cars are applications of Geoinformatics. Meteorology, oceanography, criminology and crime simulation too rely on this technology. The developments in Geoinformatics influence the progress taking place in Geography, Earth climate change studies, environmental modelling and analysis, disaster management and preparedness and telecommunications. Architecture and archaeological reconstruction also apply the technology.

Education: Geoinformatics is usually offered at postgraduate level as M.Sc or M.Tech course. Students with a background of Geography, Geology, Agriculture, Engineering, IT or Computer Science can seek admission into these courses. The curriculum is a blend of theory, practice and on field learning. Strong background in Science will be an added advantage. After post graduation, students can pursue Ph.D. Several universities and research organisations provide facilities to students registered for Ph.D in the subject. Geoinformatics is also offered through short-term diploma and certificate courses.

The study of Geoinformatics includes techniques, technology and models used for projection systems, annotation dimension and plotting, database management, 3D visualisation, thematic mapping, remote sensing platforms, geographic information systems and global positioning systems. Web mapping, photogrammetry, cartography, geodesy, disaster management, global navigation satellite systems, remote sensing and geographic information systems are some specialised topics. The study familiarises students with the latest trends in geospatial science and technology.

For a successful career in this field, candidates should possess genuine interest in the subject, be willing to learn and have enthusiasm to explore and find solutions. Analytical skills, positive outlook, creativity, communications skills are other prerequisites.

Jobs: Job opportunities for professionals in Geoinformatics are available in Central and State government organisations, research organisations, educational institutions and private business organisations.

Some central government organisations that hire these professionals are Department of Space - National Remote Sensing Agency (NRSA, Hyderabad), North East Space Application Centre, (NESAC, Shillong), Regional Remote Sensing Application Centre (RRSAC, Kharagpur, Dehradun, Jodhpur, Nagpur and Bangalore), Indian Space Research Organisation, (ISRO Bangalore), Advanced Data Processing Research Institute (ADRIN, Hyderabad) and Space Application Centre (SAC, Ahmedabad) apart from Indian Agriculture Research Institute (IARI) and Indian Council of Agriculture Research (ICAR). State government organisations include National Informatics Centre (NIC) and Space Application Centres. Typically, these organisations absorb Geoinformatics graduates into roles such as JRFs, SRFs and scientists/engineers.

Coming to opportunities in private sector, organisations that are into national survey and mapping, environmental engineering, mineral exploration, emergency services, public health, crime mapping, transportation and infrastructure, travel and tourism, market analysis and e-commerce hire Geoinformatics professionals.

Top employers include Google, TCS, Reliance Industries, Reliance Communications, Reliance Energy, CyberTech Systems, Geofin Technologies, Magnasoft Technology Services, and others. Some job roles offered in government jobs are Scientists, Project Coordinators, Project Scientists, Technical Assistants, Research Scholars, Research Associates, GIS Experts and GIS Environment Analysts. In the commercial sector, they may be hired as Project Managers, Senior System Executives Image Analysts, GIS Business Analysts, GIS Engineers, GIS Programmers and Geo-Spatial Software Engineers. Generally, jobs in this field entail frequent relocations.

Remuneration: Salary widely depends on the job role, nature of work, employer, location and discipline. It may range from Rs. 2,50,000 to Rs. 5,00,000 per annum.

Geoinformatics is still in a nascent stage. However, with more and more industries using spatial data to manage their activities, it is growing very fast. Also, there is an acute scarcity of skilled professionals in this specialised field. So Geoinformatics is promising both in terms of opportunities available and nature of work.

THE COST OF...

Sabha saw repeated disruptions on issues related to coal block allocation, foreign direct investment in retail and quotas for Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes for reservation in promotions. Consequently Lok Sabha's productivity declined to 61%.

A decline in the productivity of Parliament impairs its ability to effectively perform the duties that have been entrusted to it by the Constitution. The constitution gives Parliament the mandate to keep the government accountable by scrutinising the working of ministries, making laws to address opportunities in the legal system, discussing and passing the budget to keep the country on a firm financial footing and representing the hopes and aspirations of a billion people. With Parliament being disrupted routinely, Members of Parliament (MPs) are not able to ask ministers tough questions during question hour to assess the work that their ministries are doing. With disruptions eating into the time available for Parliamentary business, adequate time is not available for debating legislation. As a result, Bills either get passed without effective debate or remain pending in Parliament. With Parliament meeting for a fewer number of days and with its productivity falling on account of disruptions, MPs are not able to raise matters of urgent public importance and bring it to the attention of the government.

It is easy to identify political controversies which lead to Parliamentary disruption. However these political controversies are only the symptoms and not the cause of disruption. In every democracy there would be contentious issues and the strength of a democracy would be demonstrated by the quality of debate and deliberation on such issues. For debate and deliberation to happen, Parliamentary procedure would have to evolve to enable political parties on different sides of the issue to set the agenda for debate and discuss the issue in detail on the floor of the house. This would also require Parliament to meet for more number of days in a year and sit for longer hours. This would ensure that even if the proceedings are disrupted there is still enough time for deliberations.

Our Parliamentary procedures has not changed significantly over the last six years. In this context there are opportunities to learn from other countries. For example, in the British Parliament, there are certain days in a week in each Parliamentary session where the opposition parties are allowed to determine the agenda for the days discussion. The House of Commons also sits for about 150 days in a year with an average sitting lasting for seven and a half hours.

Currently our Parliament meet for an average of 70 days in a year and the rules provide that Lok Sabha would meet for 6 hours and Rajya Sabha for 5 hours. In any Parliamentary democracy, Parliament influences and is influenced by public opinion. It is an institution where ideas are discussed and political and ideological differences ironed out through debate and consensus building. If disruptions in Parliament continue then slowly but surely it would lead to people slowly disengaging with the institution of Parliament. In a representative democracy like ours, Parliament is supposed to be the voice of the people and people's disenchantment with the Parliamentary system would risk the relevance of this 60 year old institution of our society.
