State of the Economy

Depreciation of the Rupee

- Sankhanath Bandyopadhyay

he rise and fall of the value of a currency vis-a-vis other currencies is a normal development in an interconnected global economy. However, it can become a matter of concern beyond a point, because a section of people in the country gets affected when the value of its currency either rises or appreciates too much (e.g. exporters are worse off as their products become more expensive in the global market leading to a fall in demand for the same, but importers are better off as importable become cheaper in foreign currency terms) or it declines or depreciates too much (e.g. exporters face internationally lower prices for their exportable as their currency gets cheaper and importers face higher prices of importable as foreign currencies get

The depreciation of the Indian National Rupee has been witnessed since quite some time now. A conventional argument is that this automatically corrects the situation by depressing imports (fall in import demand due to rise in cost of imports) and augmenting exports (rise in export demand in rest of the world due to falling export prices), through which the domestic currency reaches its 'equilibrium' value. However, this may not happen due to a number of complex factors, and, even if such correction happens over some time, the country may face a number of problems in the meanwhile.

Why has the Rupee declined so much? Reserve Bank of India (RBI) data reveal that, during 2007-2008, the rupee was hovering around Rs. 39-40 per US dollar (USD). Since April 2008, the rupee started declining against dollar, but fluctuated between Rs. 44-53 vis-a-vis the USD. Since early May 2013, there has been a considerable fall in its value leading to a historic low of Rs. 60 per USD by the end of June 2013.

For a long time, and especially after the 2008 global financial crisis, the United States (US) had maintained ample liquidity (in terms of USD)in the global market by following an easy money policy and keeping the interest rate low. This had motivated financial investors to borrow cheap in the dollar markets and invest in emerging markets (where returns are higher), making substantial profits arising out of the difference between the higher return on investment and lower repayment cost of their borrowed funds.

During this phase of easy money policy by the US, the situation was opposite to today's scenario - foreign portfolio investments brought a surge of capital inflow in India, and the RBI was struggling to stabilize the rupee from appreciating too much by buying US dollars. The popular consensus is that the US Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke's announcement of a gradual phasing-out of its easy money policy (or the end of the 'quantitative easing" or QE policy) triggered financial investors to pull-out their assets (or financial investments) from emerging countries (including India), which led to a drastic decline of the rupee vis-a-vis the US dollar. A tightening of money supply by the US would raise the US interest rates, making dollar-denominated assets more attractive compared to rupee-denominated According to Felix Huefner, Deputy Director of the Institute of International Finance (the Global Association of Financial Institutions, with its headquarters in Washington DC),"In its early phase, quantitative easing(QE) has meant a weaker dollar and additional capital flows to emerging market (EM) economies. Now that markets focus on the end of QE, the pendulum has swung to the opposite direction."

However, although the US Federal Reserve System's phasing-out of easy money policy may have been an important factor aggravating the rupee's decline, the gradual fall of the rupee had-started much earlier due to some Indiaspecific factors, e.g. India's growing current account deficit(CAD), inflationary pressures, slowerpace of economic growth and downgrading by some of the international credit rating agencies. In other words, though the returns on Indian assets have apparently been good, some of the potential risk-factors had started prompting investors (especially the risk-averse ones) to switch away from the rupee to other currencies. Moreover, for the last couple of years, the rupee has declined not only against the US dollar, but also against other currencies like pound, euro and yen. Such erosion in the value of rupee vis-a-vis other currencies has led investors to hold their assets in other currencies instead of rupee, aggravating further the fall in rupee value against other currencies.

What is the impact on Indian economy? As the rupee declines continuously, the costs of imports go up. The rising costs of imports can have a dampening effect upon luxurious consumer importable, like, gold, jewellery and precious metals, which is good for the economy (in terms of reducing the country's current account deficit). However, since many of the industries in India, like, automobiles, machinery, chemicals, and major food processing industries, are heavily importdependent, the rising costs of imports for them may undermine their export-competitiveness. Moreover, as the cost of fuel passes in all other prices directly in production costs as an intermediate input, a rise in the cost of fuel imports is inflationary. On the other hand, some sectors, like, Information Technology (IT)&IT Enabled Services, textiles, and pharmaceuticals are expected to benefit due to their large export exposure in the international market.

What steps has the RBI taken to check the depreciation of rupee?

The rupee has declined because the demand for US dollar and other foreign currencies have gone up substantially relative to rupee. In a demand-supply framework, this means there is an excess supply of the rupee as compared to the demand for it. Hence, to restore the value of the rupee, it should be made scare in supply. Foreign Institutional Investors (FIIs) and speculators invest abroad in dollar-denominated securities via borrowing rupee to take advantage of the arbitrage opportunities. Hence, the RBI increased borrowing costs of banks so as to limit their capacity to lend to such FIIs and speculative investors. The RBI did this by increasing Marginal Standing Facility Rate or MSF(an ultra short-term borrowing scheme for scheduled commercial banks, introduced by RBI in May 2011), limiting the borrowing amount under the liquidity adjustment facility(LAF) by banks, and raising the Cash Reserve Ratio (CRR) etc.

The way forward

The fundamental India-specific reason for the depreciation of the rupee over the last few years has been the country's growing current account deficit (CAD). As imports have increased substantially compared to exports, the demand for foreign currencies (especially the US dollar) has increased substantially relative to the rupee leading to a fall in the value of rupee. The Indian economy has continued to face the problem of a growing current account deficit, which has been financed for long mainly through Foreign Institutional Investments (FIIs). These Foreign Institutional Investments (FIIs) are a highly volatile and unpredictable source of funding, which depend upon the risk-return perceptions of such FIIs for a country. It is not surprising that a reversing trend of such inflows is now exposing the vulnerabilities of capital inflows for India. Taking lessons from this experience, India should try to diversify its export market by engaging more with emerging market economies(EMEs), take proactive policies to augment greenfield Foreign Direct Investment (FDI) inflows, and curtail its unproductive luxurious imports (e.g. gold).

Singh Ahluwalia, Deputy Chairman. Planning Commission.

The Unique Identification Authority of India (UIDAI) and the direct benefit transfer (DBT) are extremely important and innovative experiments that have been undertaken by the government in the recent past. Considering the extent to which these will work, in three to four years from now, people will soon see them as game changers.

The Aadhaar numbers issued by UIDAI

The Aadhaar numbers issued by UIDAI has given a huge fillip to the financial inclusion. The Reserve Bank of India (RBI) has given very clear instructions to banks that the Aadhaar card is a valid Know-Your Customer (KYC) requirement to open a bank account. In places where banks are not physically present, a person can get an account opened after the Banking Correspondent (BC) verifies the Aadhaar number by the fingerprint reader. Of course, there will be cases where BCs are not available. In tribal areas, where 8 per cent of the population resides, it won't be very easy to have BCs. There will be problems and may be, 0.01 per cent chance of errors in reading the fingerprints. However, from the financial inclusion perspective, we have had a system that was not even 50 per cent effective. So, with the introduction of the Aadhaar-based identity authentication platform, if we move from the under-50 per cent to 90 per cent plus success in financial inclusion, I would call that a huge improvement.

The DBT has already been kicked off in 43 districts and hopefully we would add more districts to the programme. At the moment, we are doing it only for schemes where the cash transfer had been through cheques. Even with cheques, the scope for inefficiency or hassles were huge in the sense that someone has to physically collect a cheque and somebody has to physically give it. What the DBT will do is that it will completely eliminate this intermediary operation. It won't be a case where someone in authority would say that you go down to the district level to collect student scholarships, for instance. If you know who the children are and where the bank accounts lie, then at the press of a button the money should have been transferred into those accounts in a matter of seconds.

The Brave New...

Public Distribution System

The government has said it wants to implement the DBT in an experimental way as a pilot; we need to give the states a lot of flexibility to what they want to do. The Food Security Bill contains an enabling provision that state governments can switch to this mechanism and some of them have explicitly expressed the intention. Now what are the benefits of switching? The most obvious benefit is that today the customer has to depend on the Public Distribution System (PDS) shops for collection of subsidised commodities. Everyone knows that there are leakages and diversions. These problems could be handled precisely by the UIDAI. Before they give subsidised items to people, verify their fingerprinting on the Aadhaar card to ensure that only the right persons are collecting it. This is being tried in East Godavari district in Andhra Pradesh in kerosene distribution. When we used the Aadhaar card as validation mechanism, we found a 40 per cent reduction in the offtake of kerosene.

When subsidised commodities are under the control of a PDS shop, then the customer is at the mercy of the shopowner. The PDS should remain but it should actually be providing goods at an economic cost. The beneficiary should be given the entire difference between the economic cost and the subsidised price. So there will be no incentive for a person running a PDS shop to actually pilfer or divert something out of that system.

Adulteration is a big problem with the PDS now. Suppose if you get a certain amount of supply, say, wheat, for ₹ 19 per kg in the market and for ₹2 at the PDS. It is very easy for the PDS shop to adulterate the wheat with 30-40 per cent and then sell. Customers will still have a product at ₹ 2, which is actually worth buying take some time to get rid of the rubbish later on. When the captive PDS is done away with, the problem disappears because you can go to another shop to buy better stuff.

DBT Means Empowerment And

Systemic Change The DBT actually gets rid of what is currently a mai-baap sarkar attitude and essentially identifies the people whom the government wants to help. The DBT empowers the people. In a market economy, empowerment is equal to the money in your pocket. Let's not forget the Amartya Sen's research findings on Bengal famine. The famine occurred not because there wasn't enough foodgrain; it occurred because the people did not have the money to buy it. The DBT provides the people an opportunity to transform what I call power relations between a very large number of ultimately weaker section consumers and those who actually have access to the resources that they have been distributed to. If we look at it that way, anyone concerned about the poor should be very strongly in favour of the DBT.

The UIDAI and DBT experiments are new; they involve risk and you have to be willing to change. If you are not willing to change nothing will happen. Nothing worthwhile in the last 20-years in this country has been accomplished without somebody junking an old model. Whenever the system is broke, those running the system always say so. Every year we do critiques of what the ministries do. Typically the ministries say that it is a valid point and they are taking care of it. But the question is, are we doing the system change that is necessary? That try. I hope that with the DBT pilots, it actually will take place. Within one year, it would be possible to judge whether it's good and do people like it.

Newspapers recently headlined a recent CAG report on MGNREGS highlighting loss of hundreds of billions of rupees. A careful read of the report reveals that the CAG has said only in 8 per cent of the cases there seemed some impropriety. You have to ask yourself that when the government reaches out to such a large number of people, what would you call a measure of success? It is very important to look at the overall picture before arriving at unqualified conclusions. India is large and so are the numbers. (The writer is Deputy Chairman, Planning Commission)

Technology of future

anotechnology has spread to almost every field. In the recent years, its potential was realised in a big way during scientific research in various fields. Developing products based on nanotechnology - be it drugs, cosmetics, paints, clothes or washing machines, is the new trend across the world. Therefore, the field of nanotechnology is here to stay with the promise of exciting and rewarding career opportunities for those interested in sciences with a penchant for research.

Nanotechnology is an interdisciplinary science. It has wide applications in fields such as medicine, agriculture, energy, chemistry, environment, industry, communications and IT. Opportunities for nanotechnologists are galore in all these fields. Also, students from Mathematics as well as Life Sciences background can venture into this field and improve their career prospects exponentially.

The technology

Nanotechnology is the study of matter at atomic and molecular levels. It involves manipulation of matter at a miniature level called the nano scale. Nanotechnology research concentrates on particles less than one billionth of a meter in diameter. Little wonder then that research involving nanotechnology yields some fascinating and astonishing discoveries.

The biological properties of atoms and molecules are greatly different on a nano scale compared to their properties as constitutes of a material. This is the basis of nanotechnology.

Exploring atoms with this point in mind paves way for discovery of new properties of atoms, which in turn can be used to improve the materials.

It is hoped that nanotechnology will overcome some of the biggest challenges of humankind. Its intervention is purported to provide high-impact and cost effective solutions to the new-age perturbs of mankind such as energy crunch, deteriorating quality of agricultural produce and environmental conservation. Hailed as the technology of the future, it helps improve existing products and procedures and provide solutions to the contemporary demands of the world.

Surplus opportunities

There are basically two career paths in the field of nanotechnology. The first is dedicated to research. You will assume roles such as scientist, research officer, research associate or research lead and work in research organisations, government departments, universities and so

The second career path is where you apply nanotechnology to devise solutions to challenges in your field. This path presumes that you are a professional in a different field. You will work in R&D departments of business organisations and use nanotechnology as tool to develop new products or improve the existing ones. Some roles you can assume are systems designer, product designer and research analyst.

Whichever path you choose, there is no dearth of opportunities in the field. All you need are strong technical skills, inclination towards research, exceptional analytical skills, problem-solving skills, perseverance and propensity to work for long hours.

To begin your career in this field, you need a professional degree in nanotechnology. Based on your career aspirations, you can go for a Bachelor's degree and Master's degree in nanotechnology or a short-term PG diploma or certificate course in the subject.

Key players

Government and corporate houses across the globe are diverting funds into research in nanotechnology to reap its benefits. In India, until recently, nanotechnology research was a government-led initiative. However, recently, industry participation picked up and is growing rapidly. The Council of Scientific and Industrial Research (CSIR) has set up several laboratories to conduct research in this field. Apart from CSIR, premier educational institutions like IITs are contributing significantly to nanotechnology research.

There are hundreds of companies across the country incorporating nanotechnology into their products. Some key players in the field include Tata, Reliance Group, Lewis Berger, Saint Gobain Glass, Saivens Materials, Redex Nano Labs, Dabur Pharma, Eris Technologies and Nanoshel. These companies, along with educational institutes and government and non-government research organisations, generate surfeit employment in this

At the commercial level, nanotechnology plays a significant role in three major industries, namely consumer products, electronics and healthcare.

The consumer products industry was revolutionised with the entry of nanosilver, a nanomaterial popular for its antimicrobial properties. It is used in a range of consumer products like textiles, food storage containers, wound dressings, personal care appliances and paints.

In electronics, nanotechnology achieved breakthroughs in the form of new material to create compact, light and efficient gizmos.

Nano-sized gadgets developed to diagnose and treat diseases like cancer are boon to the field of medicine. Nano-pharmacology helps produce drugs that have negligible side effects

Nanotechnology or nano-science as an academic discipline is available at the bachelor's, master's, diploma and certificate levels. To study the subject at undergraduate level, you should have studied Mathematics and Science in your 10+2. To study nanotechnology at the post graduation level, you must have completed your bachelor's degree in Science or Engineering.

nanotechnology is M.Sc or M. Tech in branches like Mechanical, Chemical, Biotechnology Electronics. Computer Science.

In India, nanotechnology is in the nascent stage. However, it has the potential to grow exponentially in the coming years. So come, be a part of its evolution and reap wonderful fruits of your efforts for its
