A BLOOMING CAREER!

Do you get excited when you receive an exotic plant as a gift on your birthday? Do you wonder how your friend got such a brilliant idea! Then, for your information, gifting plants is the latest trend in a world anxious about protecting the environment. What might further interest you is that selling gift plants and flowers is a promising enterprise. So, if you are interested in plants and are exploring options to make money through the delightful connection you share with plants, horticulture is your career destination.

Horticulture is the science of plant cultivation. It deals with the production of fruits, vegetables, flowers, nuts, spices and ornamental plants. With the demand for organic produce, decorative flowers and gifting plants, the field of horticulture is emerging as both lucrative and exciting career

Prospects:

Horticulturists can find employment in government organisations and PSUs. You can assume roles as a scientist in government research organisations or Horticultural Officer/ Assistant/Inspector/Farm Supervisor or Director in the Department of Horticulture.

The current goals of horticulture sector are breeding new and improved strains of fruits, vegetables and flowers, developing exotic species, improving crop yield, quality and nutritional value, and increasing resistance to insects or diseases. If you wish to be engaged in research, plant physiology, propagation, biochemistry and genetic engineering are the areas you should be working on. The Agriculture Scientist Recruitment Board, ICAR, New Delhi conducts examinations for aspiring scientists. The posts of District Horticulture and Agriculture Officers are filled through State Public Service Commission examinations.

Krishi Vigyan Kendras offer roles like training organisers, associates and assistants. Civil service is another challenging option.

In banks, you can don roles like Rural Development Officers and Agricultural Finance Officers.

There are many opportunities in private sector. You can work as scientist in R&D departments of private seed companies or as marketing executives in private seed or pesticide company. Pharmaceutical companies based on herbal medicines also avail the services of horticulturists.

If you work for a commercial gardener, landscaping, cultivating, maintaining and harvesting farms, parks, gardens and golf courses would be some of your tasks. Hotels, resorts and private bungalows with extensive grounds for landscaping purposes are other options. You can provide services as a consultant to construction companies and landscape architecture firms to advise on plants and plant care.

If you are interested in pedagogy, you can teach in agriculture and horticulture universities. Lecturer, Reader, Assistant Professor and Associate Professor are some of the openings you can find in this field.

Coming to entrepreneurial prospects, you have the options to set up your own farm, commercial nursery or garden. Seed production, dry or cut flower ventures, cold storage, selling gift plants and export of fruits/vegetables/flowers are other viable options. Green decor, good luck, stress buster, zodiac, bonsai and flowering plants in fancy pots, are in good demand these days.

Horticulturists play significant role in agricultural practices to maximise yield. You can also work as a technical advisor motivating and advising farmers or as a mediator with marketing companies.

There are also opportunities in the area of processing, preserving and marketing fruits, flowers and vegetables.

Education:

To start your own business, good knowledge of plants and plant care would be sufficient. However, formal in-depth training would expand your options.

Horticulture or agriculture universities offer academic degrees in horticulture. The Bachelor of Horticulture is a 4-year programme and M.Sc in Horticulture spans two years. Most of the universities offer Ph.D programmes. Some universities also offer short-term training programmes.

Success factors:

It goes without saying that passion for subject and sound technical knowledge are essential to succeed in this field. Observing and analysing the responses of plants to soil, weather and treatment is critical. Good physical strength plays important role while working on outdoor plants for long hours and in harsh weather conditions.

Dr. K. Purushotham, Director of Research, YSR Horticulture University advices, "Learn by actually doing things in the field, and observing the crop behaviour and their response to changes in the climate. Then, sincerity, commitment, and hard work are must. Do not wait for the opportunities to come to you, go in search of them. Update your knowledge on the subject and also on the career opportunities, constantly".

Growth:

Depending on your interests, aptitude, qualifications and experience, you can work in horticulture-related organisations and move up in your career. You can accelerate your growth with additional training in more specialised areas of horticulture. These areas are landscape architecture, urban planning, management, and others according to the opportunities available. If you are planning to start your own business, be focused. Explore the different aspects of the business and the market. Utilising technology and employing modern techniques like online marketing and selling can help you increase business turnover significantly within a short period of

For those who are keen on making a career in the field of horticulture, there are plenty of opportunities. So, dispel the myth that opportunities are limited in this field, explore options and pursue the choice seriously. Your efforts will definitely bear fruits!
