

RESTORING SOIL FERTILITY TO SUSTAIN THE FOOD SECURITY IN INDIA

Dinesh Kumar and Nain Singh

India is the second most populous country in the world and presently inhabiting 1.21 billion people. It is projected that India would be the most populous country in year 2025 and have 1.6 billion people in the year 2050. The increased population would need more food from the ever-shrinking cultivated lands. In recent times the best fertile and productive lands have become casualty of expanding urbanization and industries. Presently India is producing about 260 million tonnes of food grains annually and would require about 294 million tonnes in 2020. It is not as simple as it looks to produce 34 million tonnes of additional food grains in the next 6 years, particularly under severely depleted soil fertility. Restoration of depleted soil fertility is going to be the key to sustain the food security in India. Hence, it is going to be a difficult task to feed the increasing number of people on sustainable basis unless we sufficiently feed the soil. Considering the importance of soil for human life, the 68th UN General Assembly has also declared 2015 the 'International Year of Soils' aiming chiefly to develop and maintain healthy soils.

Current status of soil fertility

Soil fertility is the inherent capacity of soil to support optimum crop growth by ensuring the adequate supply of plant nutrients and suitable conditions for water uptake. It is a manageable soil property which optimizes crop nutrition on both a short-term and a long-term basis to achieve sustainable crop production.

The increased food grain production in India has not been free of cost. When an agricultural produce is harvested, essential plant nutrients are removed and for conserving soil fertility the removed plant nutrients should be returned back to the soil. For each tonne of cereal grain harvested, 20-27 kg N (nitrogen), 10-19 kg P₂O₅ (phosphorus) and 22-48 kg K₂O (potassium) are removed besides sizeable amounts of secondary and micronutrients and a larger part of these nutrients are never returned back to the soil. There is a deficit of about 5 million tonnes of N+P₂O₅+K₂O fertilizers per year. Thus we are continuously mining our soils and making them less fertile for the future generations.

The status of nutrients, particularly in their available forms, is generally used to assess the soil fertility status in India. At present, there are 661 soil testing laboratories including 120 mobile vans operating in 608 districts of the country with an annual sample analyzing capacity of about 7.2 million. These laboratories prepare soil fertility maps based on the soil test data using organic carbon as an index of available nitrogen, Olsen's and Bray's method for available phosphorus and neutral normal ammonium acetate for potassium estimation. Available nutrient status in the soils is generally classified as low, medium and high which are generally followed at the National level and are given in Table 1.

Table 1. Rating chart of essential nutrients in soil

Nutrient	low	medium	high
Organic carbon (%)	< 0.5	0.5-0.75	> 0.75
Available nitrogen (N) (kg/ha)	< 280	280 - 560	> 560
Available phosphorus (P) (kg/ha)	< 10	10 - 24.6	> 24.6
Available potassium (K) (kg/ha)	< 108	108 - 280	> 280

ha: hectare (10,000 metre square land area)

One scientific study computed the nutrient index values and prepared a soil fertility map for N, P and K using 3.65 million soil analysis data collected from 533 soil testing labs representing 450 districts in the country. Details are in Table 2.

Table 2. Level of soil fertility in Indian soils

Nutrient	Percent districts as
	Low	Medium	High Fertility
Nitrogen	63	26	11
Phosphorus	42	38	20
Potassium	13	37	50

The ability of a soil to sustain higher crop production is greatly influenced by its soil organic matter (SOM) content as it determines soil's ability to supply nutrients, store water, resist physical degradation and degrade pollutants. The decreased levels of plant nutrients and SOM/SOC in soils are a serious threat to sustainable food production in the country. There is an urgent need to understand the causes for this decline in soil fertility so that efficient strategies can be adopted to restore or improve it.

Causes for decline in soil fertility

A decline in soil fertility suggest a decline in health of the soil, and is defined as 'the decline in chemical soil fertility, or a decrease in the levels of soil organic matter, pH, cation exchange capacity (CEC), and plant nutrients and an increase in concentration of toxic elements (e.g., Al, Mn) in soil'. Erosion of soil by water or wind removes top soil which is rich in nutrients and organic matter. Nutrient mining is yet another cause that decreases

NEW INFORMATION EXCHANGE STANDARD ON OFFSHORE ACCOUNTS

Pooja Rangaprasad

The Special Investigation Team (SIT) on black money set up by the Supreme Court has increased the focus on offshore bank accounts held by Indians. While it is incorrect to assume that all such offshore accounts are illegal, the lack of effective information exchange between authorities on these accounts is a concern. The mechanisms for exchanging this information between countries are governed by international standards and institutions. Until last year, this global standard for information exchange was 'on request'; often time-consuming and counter-productive as a lot of information already needed to be known before making a request. In 2014, G20 countries endorsed a new system of information exchange, automatic exchange of financial information, developed by the Organisation for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD).

Automatic Exchange of Information

Automatic Exchange of Information (AEOI) is the "routine and periodic transmission of information about non-resident persons, sent by the jurisdiction in which income or assets are located to the jurisdiction in which the person may owe tax" (OECD). It is meant to complement the earlier 'on request' mechanism and is together packaged to be a more effective information exchange system to deter tax

1. Common Reporting Standards (CRS): The CRS provides details on the reporting and due diligence procedures that need to be translated into domestic law and followed by financial institutions.

2. Model Competent Authority Agreement: A model agreement that needs to be signed by interested jurisdictions in order to operationalise automatic information exchange. The legal instruments that permit this exchange are bilateral tax treaties and the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters.

The Global Forum on Transparency and Exchange of Information for Tax Purposes (Global Forum) is the body mandated with monitoring the implementation of information exchange standards and assisting developing countries' participation. The Global Forum has 127 members (including non-OECD countries such as India), with its Secretariat based in the OECD.

Recent Developments

In October 2014, 51 jurisdictions signed a multilateral competent authority agreement to automatically exchange information based on the Multilateral Convention on Mutual Administrative Assistance in Tax Matters. Though India was unable to sign the agreement in October, reporttality clauses, India committed to undertaking automatic information exchange by 2017 when the first exchanges are scheduled to take place.

A roadmap for developing country participation was submitted to the G20 Development Working Group by the Global Forum in September 2014. One of the main initiatives proposed in this roadmap are 'Pilot Projects' where developing and developed (or G20) countries will be partnered together to assist low capacity tax administrations in implementing this standard.

Concerns- Will Developing Countries Benefit?

Tax Justice Network (www.taxjustice.net) has identified a number of loopholes in the reporting standards such as exclusion of entities with information on hard assets (real estate, yachts, planes, jewelry etc), lack of an international confidentiality standard, difficulty in identifying beneficial owners of accounts without public registries, absence of sanctions for non-cooperative jurisdictions etc. The extent to which these loopholes are fixed will determine the effectiveness of the system globally.

According to the standard, this information exchange has to be reciprocal between two countries. This is a concern for poorer countries, with limited soil fertility. Removal of more nutrients by crops than added through manures or fertilizers results in nutrient mining. Physical degradation of soil (poor structure, compaction, crusting and waterlogging) reduces soil fertility. Excessive rainfall or irrigation can lead to losses of some nutrients (nitrate, sulphate and boron) by leaching. The increase in acidity, salinity or alkalinity of soils leads to problems of nutrient deficiencies, toxicities and imbalances. Soil pollution caused by indiscriminate use of agro-chemicals and heavy metals reduces the growth of soil organisms.

RESTORING SOIL...

Restoration of soil fertility

Maintenance/restoration of soil fertility is an important aspect of crop production. Sound soil and crop management practices need to be followed to restore, maintain and improve the soil fertility for sustained crop production and food security in the country. The following practices need to be followed:

Efficient crop rotation

The role of leguminous crops in symbiotically fixing nitrogen from the air has been known since time immemorial. The idea of including a legume in the crop sequences stems from this observation. The benefits of good crop rotation are increased organic matter, nitrogen supply and improved structure of the soil.

Soil conservation and proper tillage practices

Loss of plant nutrients through soil erosion can be checked and soil fertility restored by adopting suitable agronomic, agro-forestry and engineering approaches of soil conservation. Faulty (excessive) tillage promotes soil erosion and depletes soil fertility. This can be prevented to a great extent by adopting the right kind of tillage practices.

Balanced and integrated nutrient management

Crop plants need 17 nutrients which are essential for them to complete their life cycle. If more than one is in short supply, growth is determined by the nutrient which is in the lowest supply. If several nutrients are in short supply, we need to apply all of them to get optimum crop production. Integrated nutrient management (INM) involves judicious and compared use of chemical fertilizers, organic manures including crop residues, green manures, farmyard manure, vermicompost, and biofertilizers, etc. Inclusion of leguminous crops in crop rotations helps to increase availability of different nutrients, particularly nitrogen, in soil.

Correction of soil pH

The change in soil pH may lead to increased or decreased availability of plant nutrients. For example highly acidic soils contain high amounts of iron or aluminium (which could be toxic to crop plants) and very low amounts of calcium. Similarly highly alkaline soils may have very low levels of iron and crops in these soils may suffer from iron deficiency. Further, the microbial activities are severely affected by such adverse changes in pH of soils. Several methods of correcting soil acidity and alkalinity are available. For example, acidic soils can be reclaimed by adding the required amounts of lime and alkali soils by adding gypsum.

Proper crop management

Weeds, if not controlled, remove large quantities of nutrients from the soil. Therefore, weed control is very essential to maintain soil fertility and soil productivity. Weeds can be controlled by sowing weed free seeds, uprooting of the weed plants from the crops, smothering weeds through mulching, applying herbicides and also employing biological agents to manage them.

Conclusion

The decreased fertility of Indian soils could become a serious threat to food security if efforts are not made immediately to correct it. Farmers need to put back the same or more amounts of nutrients and organic matter that had been removed or lost from the soils. Fertilizers are getting costlier inputs in crop production and their sole use may not be economical and sustainable. Integrated use of fertilizers, organic manures, biofertilizers and other nutrient sources along with efficient soil, crop and nutrient management practices can ensure proper soil fertility and hence sustain food security.

NEW INFORMATION ...

systems to collect the relevant information. Expectation of reciprocity also does not take into account the reality that wealthy citizens are more likely to hide their assets in rich countries with well-developed financial centers rather than in poor countries. So there is a much higher likelihood of citizens from developing countries hiding their money in Swiss banks (for instance), rather than the other way around. A provision that would allow non-reciprocity in favour of developing countries to first receive information on a temporary basis, without expecting them to send the same information, should be explored.

There are also concerns that jurisdictions would be allowed to choose with whom they want to engage in automatic information exchange. This could leave developing countries at a disadvantage with more powerful countries refusing to share information. The grounds for refusing to engage with a jurisdiction will only be examined in a Global Forum peer review process at a much later stage. More robust provisions are needed to ensure that as long as confidentiality requirements are met, no jurisdiction can refuse to share information.

One of the limitations of the G20 and OECD leading this process has been that automatic information exchange can seem imposed on other developing countries rather than emerging through a process of consensus. Fundamental reforms in the global institutional architure on tax cooperation are required to ensure that developing countries are able to participate on equal footing. This includes upgrading the current UN Tax Committee to an inter-governmental body with adequate resources, to ensure all countries have a voice in setting the agenda and designing the rules.

Conclusion

India has been a vocal supporter of automatic information exchange in the G20 for many years and was one of the first developing countries to support its adoption as a global standard. India now has an important role to play, through the G20, BRICS, UN, and Global Forum, to make commitments towards capacity building and ensuring that the rules are in favour of poorer countries. India and the BRICS have an opportunity to demand a representative space for cooperation on tax and transparency, under the UN, at the ongoing Financing for Development negotiations leading up to the Post 2015 agenda this year.

Finally, it is important to note that automatic information exchange is mainly a tool to deter tax evasion and will not help 'bring the money back', which has been the misguided focus of the black money debate in India. Unless the drive to investigate offshore bank accounts of Indians is situated in a broader framework to curb generation and outflow of black money in the first place, the exercise will yield little result.
